Bibliogov. Paperback. Book Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. Paperback. 28 pages. Dimensions: 9.7in. x 7.4in. x 0.1in. Pursuant to a congressional request and a legislative requirement, GAO reviewed how various North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) countries were implementing their reciprocal defense procurement memoranda of understanding (MOU) with the United States, focusing on: (1) how the United States and its allies viewed and implemented MOU; (2) whether MOU provide opportunities for U. S. firms to freely and fairly compete in allied defense markets; (3) the extent to which allied governments tariff practices affected contract selections; (4) allied contract award grievance procedures; and (5) the Department of Defenses (DOD) efforts to monitor MOU. GAO found that: (1) MOU obligate signatories to evaluate bids without considering national laws and regulations regarding tariff costs and seek to eliminate buy-national laws and tariffs relating to defense procurements; (2) the DOD method of meeting MOU obligations by waiving the Buy American Act has permitted European firms to compete with U. S. firms for costly defense contracts; (3) although DOD estimated that it had opened at least 44 percent of its procurement market to foreign competition in fiscal year 1990, European governments stated that the United States has limited their access to the U. S. defense market; (4) allied officials stated that they seek to maximize competitive opportunities, but reserve the right to limit competition or direct contracts to national or other European sources; (5) U. S. industry officials stated that such factors as lessening U. S. technology transfer controls, understanding foreign defense procurement practices, and maintaining a substantial in-country presence are required to successfully compete for defense-related contracts in Europe; (6) although DOD added procurement procedure annexes to existing MOU to promote equal treatment for U. S. contractors and promote more openness and accountability...
